Once a week, members of the Happy Family Sunday School class transform a shallow, green plastic butter tub into a receptacle for their offerings to God. That finished, the butter tub gets set atop a pile of miscellaneous papers at the far end of the front pew.

So it was last Sunday, that when the congregation stood to sing the opening hymn, Caleb tried to take up a collection among the people in the first few rows. At first, I winked at my son’s indiscretion, but when he passed the plate my way a third time, I nabbed it out of his hand.

As I already had my hands full, holding nine-month-old Jacob, I slipped the bowl under him and continued to sing.

A few stanzas later, it hit me what I was doing. I had Jacob square in the middle of an offering plate. I thought to myself, “O, Father God, I need to pile Isaac in there on top of him, and Caleb as well.”

Since becoming a father four years ago, I have renewed appreciation for the patriarch Abraham being able to place his Isaac on the altar.

As my family has grown to include three kids, so, too, has my appreciation for my parents and the sacrifices they made for their five.

In that way it’s been gratifying to put together both an issue that celebrates parents and a special honor roll insert that acknowledges a select group of them. Doing so has given me the opportunity to talk to a number of parents, read their books, conduct interviews, and get “the real lowdown” from their children.

I’ve come to appreciate each of the parent-authors in this issue. Jay Kesler is a nationally recognized authority on the family, of course, and tremendously wise in family ways. He shares an excerpt from his latest work in this issue.

Jan and George Glass are known to many people associated with Taylor. Their article is abstracted from an interview; there was much we could not get in. For example, George, on being a grandparent: “There are only two kinds of grandparents: you’re either lonesome, or you’re tired.”

While a student at Taylor, all I knew of Jim and Sally Conway was what I saw reflected in their daughters. Since that time, I have been introduced to Barbara, Brenda, and Becki’s parents, as you may have been, through their writing and speaking ministry. Here, they share about communication.

Purveyor of Taylor history Wes Robinson ’50 brought to my attention the fact that Wendell Willkie’s father was an alumnus. A straw poll taken of my family during Christmastide, however, revealed only a passing familiarity with the name Willkie. Ah, the fleeting nature of fame, but, oh, the lessons to be learned from that family.

One of the “perks” to working in this office is that I’m able to read the magazine before it is published. When I read Roland Coffey’s article, the illustration he uses of a father tossing his child into the air lodged in my heart. His story has made a similar impression on others with whom I’ve shared it. Perhaps it will on you, too.

Whether you’re a parent or grandparent, single or married, childless or not, there is something in these stories that is worth your while. There is something about the selfless task of parenting from which we all can learn.

But sometimes I wonder what my children are learning...Caleb’s toy car had a wreck and “ran off the road” last week in our parlor. He was the worker man, he declared, and planned to fix the car with his tools. The five people in the car were injured, however, and he asked me to call—in this order—the lawyer, the police, the ambulance, and the tow truck.

The lawyer? Whatever are his parents teaching that child?

Back issues

Taylor puts out a great magazine! In fact I had an older copy of one with a few pages missing of which I am hoping you can get me a copy. I need a back issue of the fine arts edition, vol. 25, no. 4, Summer, 1989, entitled, “Creativity and Imagination: The Role of the Fine Arts.” I’m actually missing pages 19-24. If I could obtain copies of these pages it would help me a great deal. Thanks so much for your help in this matter. May the Lord continue to anoint and bless your ministry and efforts in building his kingdom!

Just now catching up

I just would like to comment on how well you are doing with the Taylor magazine.

I especially like the summer, 1990, issue on “Seize the Decade.” You’ll say, “How far behind are you?” I just got back from India at the end of March, and am now just getting to read some of the articles. I just don’t throw them away until I’ve read most of them. They are educational and informative. Of course, having been away for so long, I longed for good reading—that which would inform and also inspire.

Thanks for the good work you’ve done. Keep it up!

Revolutionary ideas

Please allow me to express how much I appreciate receiving Taylor. At this point, I have no recollection of how I came to be placed on your mailing list, but I’m grateful that I can read it regularly.

I was especially impressed with April L. Walker’s “Revolutionary Ideas” (“Holy Ground,” Autumn 1991, pp. 15 f.). How may I secure a copy of Ralph Dodge’s autobiography, The Revolutionary Bishop?

Bragging rights

I concur with Sam Eddy’s observation concerning Taylor’s baseball team conference championships in 1975 and 1976 (Exchange, “Holy Ground,” Autumn, 1991). In addition to setting the record straight, Sam listed a number of players who enjoyed outstanding seasons during that time.

Having been a member of these teams and a teammate of each of those individuals, I feel obligated to point out that none of them enjoyed the success that Sam did on those teams. Each of those years Sam led the team in most offensive categories including batting average, home runs, and RBI. Indeed, much of the team’s success would have been impossible without Sam’s contribution.

Amorality is nipping at our heels

The Exchange section of the Autumn ’91 Taylor magazine poignantly revealed how secular thought has infiltrated evangelical Christianity, specifically concerning abortion and the pro-choice movement. I find this truly alarming!

Unfortunately, the church through the years has dogmatically held “black and white” positions on “grey-area” issues, alienating many people.

Fortunately, however, God through his Word has given us inviolable truths to provide boundaries within which we can more freely and fully fellowship with both God and man. Stepping outside these boundaries results in chaos and much harm, just as a young toddler would experience were he to step outside his protective fence. When these inviolable truths are ignored, serious error ensues. For example, when the deity of Christ is challenged, cults arise. The sanctity of human life is another important and inviolable truth (Gen. 1:27, “So God created man in his own image...”) The pro-choice stance begs the issue, using such pro-abortion arguments as “a lesser evil”—abortion is less undesirable than rape, incest, unloved and abused children, poverty, and so on.

“Do not be overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good” (Rom. 12:21).

As evangelical Christians, we are not to be conformed by worldly opinion, or socially or politically correct ideation, but are to be transformed by the renewing of our minds in Christ Jesus.

As a radiology physician I am awed by human life, visualizing it sonographically by 4-6 weeks gestational age and following that life as it progresses and matures.

"For you created my inmost being: you knit me together in my mother's womb. I praise you because I am fearfully and wonderfully made" (Ps. 139:13-14, see also Jer 1:5).

Though scripture emphasizes the sanctity of life, it is unfortunately being attacked from both outside the church and within. Out of this ignorance and error, situational ethics has arisen with amorality close at her heels.

Reproductive freedom is a "grey-area" that should be decided by the individuals involved. Destructive freedom—abortion—however, is morally wrong and cannot be accepted. Who's next: the elderly, the undesirables, the handicapped?

How soon we forget the lessons of history! Michael A. Kinzer, M.D. '79 Fort Wayne, Indiana

No place for pro-abortion arguments

God makes it very clear in the Bible that we are not to take innocent human life; God also makes no distinction in the Bible between the high value of human life before or after it is born (see Gen, 25:21-23, Job 10:8-11, Job 31:15, Ps. 22:10, Ps. 51:5, Ps. 139:13-16, Jer. 1:4-5, Luke 1:41-44, etc.). Therefore, there is absolutely no biblical justification for killing preborn children.

At eight weeks after conception, children have already had a beating heart for four weeks, have had measurable brain waves for two weeks, feel pain, and respond to touch. Pictures of fetal development and results of abortion clearly demonstrate that abortion is the brutal taking of innocent human life.

We live in a fallen world and there are many tragic situations in which we as Christians are called to work (see Matt. 5:13-16, Matt. 25:31-46, Luke 10:25-37, etc.), but murdering children is not the biblical solution for any tragedy—including unloved children, rape, incest or lack of support for women in crisis pregnancies.

In this age of relativism, the world would like us to think that every issue is gray, but God has established certain absolutes and killing children is wrong. We must, however, show the world that there is forgiveness and compassion for the repentant who violate God's absolutes.

Abortion is the brutal taking of innocent human life. More than 150 million babies are killed each year. I was shocked that you would provide space for people to attempt to justify their promotion of the sin of abortion (Exchange, "Holy Ground," Autumn, 1991). Are you so influenced by our relativistic culture that you have lost the biblical concept of sin? Would you have provided space for someone to attempt to justify the sin of adultery or homosexuality?

Abortion is brutal taking of innocent human life!

Three cheers by a four-year-old

I wanted to share with you at Taylor our very own Taylor cheerleader.

My granddaughter, Kirsten Sowers, is four years old and loves being dressed as a Taylor cheerleader. Kirsten's Taylor heritage is strong: her grandmother, Blanche (Schwarzwelder '58) Sowers; both her dad, Allen Sowers '84, and her mom, Patricia (Irvin '85) Sowers; and both her uncle and aunt, Brad '89 & Jennifer (Alberson '89) Irvin.

I trust you'll enjoy this picture of (hopefully) one of the next generation of Taylor students.

ATTENTION, HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS:

Tuition-free summer programs at Taylor University are available to high school students this summer, June 22-July 24. Two options are offered, one designed exclusively for children of alumni, the other for students meeting designated "honors" requirements. Both programs offer high school students who have just completed their junior or senior year at a taste of college life and the opportunity to earn up to six hours of college credit. Expenses of the program are covered in part by a tuition scholarship from Taylor, worth approximately $1,200. Room, board and other fees, totaling approximately $550, are the responsibility of the student. Contact the Office of Alumni Relations for additional information.

NAE CELEBRATES WITH 50 CANDLES ON CAKE

President George Bush, evangelist Billy Graham, and Taylor University President Jay Kesler were among the featured speakers to address the 50th annual convention of the National Association of Evangelicals, held March 3-5 in Chicago. NAE Executive Director Dr. Billy Melvin '51 was honored for his 25 years of service to the organization.

NO SUN TANS IN ALASKA THIS TIME OF YEAR

While many of their compatriots from across the nation were relaxing on Florida beaches, a number of Taylor students chose instead to spend their spring break helping others. Taylor World Outreach this spring sponsored work/mission trips to Alaska, Arizona, and Guatemala.

AND NOW, A WORD FROM OUR SPONSOR...

Taylor University's first-ever television commercial aired 21 times in the Fort Wayne market this winter, announcing the Fort Wayne extension program.

Sometimes aired during network coverage of the winter Olympic games; the Taylor ad, which featured a rotating earth and the flaming torch from the University seal, coincidentally bore a marked resemblance to the network's own choice for advertising its coverage of the games. The television ads were part of a multimedia marketing strategy to the Fort Wayne populace that includes, among others, newspaper and billboard advertisements.

Q What are the benefits of locating a Taylor education in an urban setting?

A The urban setting provides a base for a range of programs and alternative course offerings simply impossible or difficult to achieve in Upland. The large urban base makes a Taylor education accessible to more people. Further, the urban setting increases Taylor's potential to diversify its student mix by socio-economic status, age, race, and other non-traditional populations.

Q How does the Fort Wayne extension campus fit into the University's long-range goals?

A Virtually every aspect of the Fort Wayne setting provides a point-by-point opportunity to address the long-range plan for the University. The Upland campus is limited in its ability to service the long-range plan; the Fort Wayne location and properties remove those limits and open new avenues for innovation.

Q There are risks involved in any venture. How does Taylor plan to deal with the risks involved in assuming the liabilities involved in the acquisition process?

A In some ways, Summit is unlike other struggling institutions. Their officials initiated merger talks while they were still current on payroll and on all loans; the campus is well maintained, and half their buildings were built since 1972. Their problems stem from economies of scale and a dwindling demand for their educational product.

First, our view is that Taylor can develop viable curricular offerings which are profitable.

Second, steps have been taken to measure and contain financial risks.

Finally, there are new revenue sources available only in Fort Wayne, and creative educational programs in urban settings are good candidates for grant support. Thus, potential for increased gift support exists in this venture.

Responding is Dr. Charles Jaggers, senior vice president for Taylor University.

SUMMIT/FORT WAYNE BIBLE COLLEGE

A Tradition of Training Christian Leaders

The Taylor University-Fort Wayne extension campus will be situated on the historic site of a school with its own rich heritage. More information about Summit Christian College will appear in the summer issue of Taylor, but in the meantime, a brief overview follows.

Founded in 1895, and known for years as Fort Wayne Bible College, Summit has a nearly 100-year-old tradition of preparing Christian men and women for ministry and service.

The campus's oldest residence hall, Schultz Hall, dates back 1904; Summit's newest facility, the activities center, was completed in 1989.

The college is located in a residential section of Fort Wayne on a 32-acre campus bisected by busy Rudisill Blvd.

Summit offers an urban setting and a flexible academic program, benefits enjoyed by a number of non-traditional students (e.g., students who are older, married, with children, or already on a career track).

A Christian service component is required of students. Many Summit students volunteer each year for service throughout the Fort Wayne community.

Though historically affiliated with the Missionary Church (that affiliation will cease July 1), the college has long welcomed Christian students of all denominations.

SCC/FWBC alumni actively engaged in Christian ministry and service occupations may be found throughout the United States and abroad.
Historic decision announced:

Taylor University to open Fort Wayne campus

Opens July 1, 1992

Looking the future in the face, the Taylor University Board of Trustees, on January 31, 1992, determined to embrace it.

In what has been called one of the more significant decisions ever to be made in the lengthy history of the University, the Board of Trustees voted unanimously on January 31 to establish a campus of Taylor University in Fort Wayne, Ind., a city of 300,000 about 60 miles north of the Upland campus.

Positioned for the Future

“What this does is position Taylor for the 21st century,” says Dr. Jay Kesler, president of Taylor University. “We’re excited about the tremendous potential for expanded programs with a Fort Wayne campus. The urban setting gives us a chance to apply our offerings in an environment that is more attractive to minority students and one that is “user-friendly” to the non-traditional student—the older, married student who has kids and may be working at a degree a little bit at a time.”

Future plans for the Fort Wayne campus include graduate and continuing education programs, he says.

New Opportunities in Urban Setting

There are other benefits, as well. Urban Fort Wayne will complement the rural Upland setting where Taylor is based. “Some students like cornfields,” Kesler says. “Others do not.”

A satellite campus in Fort Wayne’s urban setting provides a base for programs that “historically have been difficult or impossible to achieve in Upland,” says Senior Vice President Dr. Charles Jaggers. He cites a criminal justice program and a cooperative nursing degree as examples.

Fulfills Long-Range Objectives

Establishing a satellite campus was not a new idea to the Taylor University Board of Trustees. But it was an idea whose time had come. Last year, Board members approved the long range plan for the University—a document that called for the development of satellite campuses, as appropriate. “The ink was hardly dry on the paper,” says Jaggers, “when an overture was received from the leadership of Summit Christian College.”

Summit officials, faced with a dwindling enrollment and an uncertain future, sought to merge into Taylor. “The Taylor Board responded positively,” recounts Jaggers, who was appointed to chair a task force to consider the option.

After extensive research, study, and review, the task force recommended to the Board at its January meeting that Taylor proceed with the merger-acquisition of Summit (until three years ago known as Fort Wayne Bible College). The Board approved the action unanimously.

As a result of that decision, “Taylor University-Fort Wayne extension campus” will officially open its doors on July 1, 1992. Considerable implementation activity has already been generated on both campuses, says Jaggers. And the doors have already been open for quite some time.

Founded in 1895, and known as Fort Wayne Bible College for a number of years, Summit has a respected heritage of training leaders for Christian service.

Building a Strong Program

In keeping with strengths of the present Summit program, the extension campus will offer degrees in education, psychology, biblical studies, and pastoral ministries, Jaggers says. In the future, the curriculum may be expanded to include course work in criminal justice, health support services, and urban studies, as well as graduate programs in theology, education, psychology, and social work.

The Taylor University academic program will become effective with the start of the 1992-1993 academic year. Students graduating from Summit this year and next year will receive a diploma with the Summit name, in keeping with accreditation requirements. Diplomas awarded thereafter will bear the name Taylor.

Though the two colleges will share a common name, there will be a difference in tuition and fees. The total costs, including tuition and room and board, at the Fort Wayne campus will be $10,500, according to Jaggers. Students at the Upland campus will pay $13,650.

Providential Timing

Taylor has a current enrollment of 1,740; the Fort Wayne site enrolls 410.

The cost factors associated with adding that many students to the Upland campus “would require a quantum leap in terms of facilities,” says Jaggers. “The building costs could run up to $40 million.”

There might also be a cost in the ethos of Taylor, he says. “We would not want to lose that intimate quality and sense of community that is now a part of Taylor.”

“That is why the Board chose to develop satellite campuses, as appropriate,” says Jaggers. “But the question was, ‘How do we go about it?’ ” It was into this context that the overture from Summit officials arrived.

“This opportunity was brought to us, not sought by us,” says Kesler. “We wanted to be careful to discern God’s will and purpose for Taylor’s future. We didn’t want others to look back from the year 2050 and say we had been myopic in our vision for Taylor.”
“DON’T CLOSE YOUR EYES,” STUDENTS TOLD

AIDS awareness was the subject of an April academic convocation featuring Dr. Alice Joy Weddle, professor of teacher education at Summit Christian College. She addressed the subjects of transmission, prevention, and the church’s response, encouraging students to become both informed and involved—and to “be sensitive: people are hurting deep.”

A THEOLOGIAN WHO Didn’T KNOW GOD

Dr. Eta Linnemann lectured in a dozen classes during a three-day visit this spring before returning to her native Germany. Taught the historical-cultural approach to theology—that Christ was not God, and that the miracles recorded in the Bible did not happen—she passed these same lessons on to her students until, as she says, “God, in his grace, got hold of my life.” She shared her stirring testimony with Taylor students and faculty in a special evening session.

RUBBING ELBOWS WITH A TRUE PATRIOT

Thomas Phillips, recently retired chairman and CEO of Raytheon Company, addressed students, faculty and area business executives during the day-long 12th annual business seminar, sponsored by the department of business, accounting, and economics. Raytheon, a multi-billion dollar company, is manufacturer of the Patriot missile system. According to Prof. Robert Gortner, associate dean of the business department, Phillips is known for his Christian witness at the highest levels of business and society.

NORTH STIRS CONTROVERSY IN MIDWEST

Easily the most controversial figure to set foot on campus during the spring semester was Lt. Col. Oliver North. The former Marine’s $25-per-ticket lecture on March 16 was sponsored, not by the University, but by leaders of a local charity who rented the Rediger auditorium for the occasion. Some students and local community members were outspoken about what they perceived as a university-sanctioned event. “Taylor is not a sponsor of this event any more than of a conference group renting the facility,” replied President Jay Kesler to one concerned letter writer. “The interesting side in this situation is that in this day of ‘political correctness’ it is difficult to say no to any voice without being accused of stifling academic freedom and free speech.”

Campus safety director minds his Ps & Qs

Dave Wallis hasn’t always balanced the roles of pastor, policeman, and parent. In fact, for some years he was preoccupied with earning a degree in agriculture and managing the family farm in northern Michigan—“God’s country,” he calls it.

Then came a persistent tug at his heart, a calling to the ministry. Wallis resisted for two years. “I kept rationalizing it away,” he says. “When I finally said ‘yes,’ I had a complete attitude change. From that point on, I’ve been excited about the possibilities in ministry.”

Pursuing those possibilities led Wallis to Taylor University in 1985 for further preparation and training.

It also led him to the campus safety office in pursuit of part-time employment. He was hired on the spot, and soon promoted to full-time status. Since then, Wallis has been able to take up to nine credit hours per semester tuition-free.

“That’s one of the benefits of working full-time here,” he says. “It has certainly helped me.”

Wallis received his bachelor’s degree in January, 1991, and now would nurture me along and had me preach once a month to get my feet wet. I’ll always be thankful for what he did in my life.”

After Rediger’s death in 1989, Wallis waited a few months before accepting leadership responsibility for the church. This allowed some time for adjustment to a newborn baby in the family.

“My priority should be—and I try to keep it so—my family,” Wallis says. “I’ve been counseled by pastors who have said they’ve made awful mistakes by putting family down the road as far as priorities are concerned. I ask my wife to tell me when I give too much attention to these other areas of my life. We talk about it often.”

Though a licensed local pastor, Wallis is limited in what he can accomplish on a part-time basis. “That’s a frustration,” he says. “I
Some wish I were a full-time pastor so I could do so much more than I am able to do now. I can’t get out and do all the visitation I’d like."

Wallis’s promotion to director of campus safety has not eased the demands on his time. The position carries with it a mixture of pleasant and not-so-pleasant tasks, he says. "I recently received a letter from a student who could not understand why he received a ticket and, furthermore, why it would not be voided," he sighs. "If there is anything that ruins our public relations with the students and staff here at Taylor, it is the necessity of ticketing."

Even in this role, however, Wallis sees opportunities for ministry. Taylor’s campus safety officers participate in the same 12-week, rigorous training program required of sheriff deputies and city officers.

Wallis went into the program hoping to be a positive witness. "It was a challenge for me," he says. "My lifestyle and the lifestyle of many of the police officers was quite different."

Wallis found that his instructors positively reinforced his own convictions that police work should be an act of service. Though they didn't teach from a "Christian" perspective, Wallis found that it was "very much in tune with the way we ought to be as Christians."

"A police officer is not to harass the community or to be a Gestapo police," he adds. "but to serve and protect."

One problem with police work, says Wallis, is a tendency to develop a hardened "us against them" mentality after several years on the job.

"That’s the challenge for a Christian in law enforcement," he says: "Don’t ever lose that focus."

Another challenge for Wallis is integrating aspects of the pastorate into his job at campus safety. "I’m trying to shepherd a flock at church and steer them in the right direction," he says, "and likewise, we’re trying to do the same thing here. Yet, the way I go about it is a little different at church than here." Part of this integration, according to Wallis, is showing people that even in negative situations can be used as a learning experience.

But it is a fine line and a constant struggle for him. "I concentrate on being the nurturing, merciful, loving pastor; but on the other side, I am a law enforcement officer who needs to uphold the law and treat all as equals. I sometimes have to make decisions that go against the grain a little on the pastoral side.”

Wallis hopes that students who have been “taken in” will see it as a turning point in their lives, and “one day will be very effective servants of God.”

While Wallis enjoys his job as campus safety director, his heart is set on full-time pastoring. He’s looking forward to it “like going to an amusement park.”

Though he says he will go wherever he feels led, Wallis is hoping to return to God’s country. "Ultimately," he says, "I’d like to pastor up in northern Michigan where I grew up. I just feel I can identify with those people best.”—RD

David Wayne named NAIA All-American

David Wayne, a senior at Taylor University, has been named to the 1992 NAIA Division I All-America basketball second team. Ten players were named to both the first and second team. Wayne becomes only the fourth player in Taylor basketball history to be named to the NAIA All-America team, and the first since Forrest Jackson ’54 in 1954 to be as high as second team. The last player to earn All-America status for Taylor was Ralph Gee x ’87 in 1987 when he was named to the third team.

Wayne, the NAIA District 21 Division I Player of the Year, led Taylor in scoring this season with a 17.6 average. He finished his career as the Trojans third all-time leading scorer with 1,905 points. Wayne holds numerous records at Taylor, including most three-point field goals made in a season, 91, and career, 303. He also is the leader in free throws made in a season, 177, and career, 460.—JR

FIRST CLASS: Elementary education major David Wayne will graduate in May with a 3.5 grade point average.

Playwright, play make debut on Taylor stage

When the lights came on for the premiere production of Thom Verratti's Cosmographicum, those seated in Taylor's Little Theatre were met by the unexpected. Rather than traditional stage lights, a single, glaring lightbulb flashed on, positioned nearly in the lap of some theatre-goers. Behind the bulb stood the play's protagonist, a frustrated playwright trying to make sense of the life of 17th-century mathematician and astronomer Johannes Kepler.

Perhaps mirroring aspects of his work, Thom Verratti '90 is himself a study in contrasts. A graduate of Taylor's computer science program, he works as a computer systems integration specialist in Indianapolis.

"But that's only so I can eat," he says. In his spare time, he pursues his real passions: writing and theatre.

Although he has been writing since age nine, Verratti says he never occurred to him to study writing while at Taylor. "To be an artist you need talent," he says. "You don't study it."

Furthermore, he claims that he doesn't know how to write plays. "I just imagine what I would want to see as an audience member. I think about as an actor what I would want to do. I think about lighting and props—what would be exciting?"

For Verratti, the bottom line is he wants to make a difference and he believes playwrighting affords that opportunity. Of Cosmographicum, he says, "I hope Christians are encouraged. I hope doubters are bothered."

In program notes accompanying the production, Director of Theatre

SUPPORTING CAST: "I have a wonderful family," says playwright Thom Verratti '90. "They're very, very good."

Dr. Oliver Hubbard says, "At Taylor we choose shows that reveal something of the human condition, that have theatrical viability and vitality, and that help us transcend our parochial limitations through their style and/or themes. Thom Verratti's Cosmographicum is being produced this evening because it meets each of these criteria and provides the level of playwrighting quality that challenges the rest of us to strive for our best."

Another of Verratti's plays, a one-act comedy called Sings, was produced this semester as an independent project of directing students at Indiana University.

Verratti hopes to pursue graduate work in the highly selective playwrighting program at IU.

Meanwhile, he continues to write on present projects and search for ideas for future ones. That is where his future lies, he says. "I don't want another computer job."—AC
WHEELCHAIR WONDER

Alfred (Skip) Wilkins, 42, addressed Taylor students in chapel on March 30. A quadriplegic since a water skiing accident at age 17, Wilkins is one of the world's premiere wheelchair athletes. A gifted communicator, he interwove his testimony with his chapel address, urging students to discover the gifts they possess.

CAMPUS VISITATION DAYS

"A great success" is how Kim Barnett-Johnson, coordinator of minority student recruitment, programs, and retention describes the annual minority visitation weekend held in late February. A total of 27 students and 10 parents represented nine states.

Two campus visitation days were held this spring for Taylor's Fort Wayne extension campus program. Participating students and parents representing several states.

SUPPORT GROUP OUT OF THIS WORLD

Senior Mitzi Thomas qualifies as a non-traditional student. She is past the 18- to 22-year-old age group, lives at home, is pursuing career objectives, and has two children with a third one due any day (which caused some consternation in Dr. Alan Winquist's history class on April Fool's Day).

When she arrived at Taylor she felt rather isolated from the mainstream of campus life, and decided to do something about it. The result is a support group for Mature And Returning Students (MARS) to help ease their transition into college life.

ANDREW NAMED TO ALL-DISTRICT TEAM

Rhonda Andrew, a senior for the Lady Trojans basketball team, was recognized for her contributions this season by being named to the NAIA All-District team, the HCW All-Conference team, and the NCCAA All-District team. She led Taylor in scoring (19.7 ppg.) and rebounding (8.6 rpg.) this season.

LADY TROJAN TENNIS PLAYERS GO NATIONAL

The women's tennis team is preparing to make its first-ever appearance in the NAIA national tournament. The Lady Trojans captured the NAIA District 21 tennis title last fall and will travel to Kansas City for the national tournament in May. Three freshmen, two seniors, and a junior comprise the top six players on the women's team.

Haley shoots to top of charts, record book

"Bombs Away" could be the key phrase for senior Rachel Haley's basketball career at Taylor University. A four-year starter, Haley holds most of the scoring records and all of the three-point shooting records for the Lady Trojans.

On a squad plagued by injuries this season, Haley, along with the four other seniors, held the team together well enough to finish the 1991-92 season with a mark of 11-21 and advance to the championship game of the NCCAA District tournament after being seeded seventh. Along the way, Haley solidly established herself as one of the premier players ever to play for the Lady Trojans.

"Rachel came to Taylor with a high level of skill and that helped to push her teammates to play at a higher level," says head coach Tena Krause. "Her intensity and leadership on the floor influenced the other players to play harder."

One of the highlights of the 1991-92 season came on January 7, when Haley scored 29 points in a win over Goshen College and became the Lady Trojans' all-time leading scorer with 1,773 points. She surpassed Heidi White '91 who had held the record for one year with 1,772 points. By the end of the season Haley increased her career scoring total to 2,142 points giving her the second highest scoring total ever—man or woman—at Taylor. Only former Trojan star Jim Bushur '89 with 2,213 points has out scored her.

Most of Haley's points did not come the easy way. In fact, over half of her career points were scored from behind the 1992 three-point line. Haley connected on 377 three-point bombs in her career (1,131 points), including 103 during her senior season. By comparison, David Wayne '92, the current leader for the Trojans, has 294 three-pointers in his career.

"Our team often took their cues from Rachel," says Coach Krause. "If she could come out and hit a couple of three-pointers early in a game, everyone seemed to play better."

Haley capped off her four years at Taylor by being named the NAIA District 21 Player of the Week after the final week of the 1991-92 season. In four games that week Haley scored 111 points, including three games of more than 30 points. She also hit for a school-record nine three-pointers in an upset win over Grace College, missing the national three-point record by just one.—JR
Uncommon valor
A season with Taylor basketball

Making the uncommon become common is what the Taylor University men's basketball program has accomplished over the past few years. Before the 1982-83 basketball season, only three other teams in Taylor history had won 20 or more games, and no team had ever captured a district title and advanced to the NAIA national tournament.

During the past 10 seasons, however, the Trojans have won no less than 20 games and currently have a streak of eight straight years with at least 25 wins. They also have now won district championships and played in the national tournament in Kansas City six times.

The 1991-92 Taylor squad started the year with the expectations of past seasons hanger over them. Even with three starters from the previous season lost to graduation, the tradition of winning built during the last decade had become common-place and virtually expected each season.

A 94-52 thrashing of cross-county rival Indiana Wesleyan to open the season was the beginning of a schedule that would see the Trojans compete in five different states and face competition from four others. The early season travel itinerary included a tournament championship at Saginaw Valley State University in Saginaw, Michigan, and another tournament victory at Belmont College in Nashville, Tennessee. In all, Taylor captured four holiday tournaments in November and December, including the Ivanhoe's-Taylor Classic.

The Trojans were on an 11-game winning streak and climbing in the NAIA national polls when they were up-ended on the road at DePauw University 62-56 in mid-January. Another 11-game streak then took place and Taylor reached the number five spot in the NAIA polls, the school's highest ranking ever. Only a double-overtime loss at Franklin College in late February kept the Trojans from approaching the school record of 16 straight wins.

For the first time, the NAIA split its basketball competition into two divisions for the 1991-92 season and Taylor entered the NAIA District 21 Division I tournament as heavy favorites. A 66-51 victory over Indiana University-Southeast and an impressive 92-63 romp over Tri-State University in the championship game, propelled the Trojans to the NAIA Division I national tournament in Kansas City.

Despite a 51-48 loss to Cumberland (K.Y.) College in the first round of the NAIA tournament, Taylor still posted the second best record in school history at 29-5. David Wayne '92 and Ty Platt '92 ended their careers as the most winning class ever at Taylor. The duo took part in 117 wins and only 24 losses in their four year careers.

Among several other records, Wayne finished his career as the third all-time leading scorer at Taylor with 1,905 points. Platt, the Trojans leading rebounder for the past two seasons, posted career totals of 1,149 points and 572 rebounds. Wayne was named the NAIA District 21 Player of the Year, while Platt joined him on the All-District team. Coach Paul Patterson was named District Coach of the Year.

Seven of the Trojans top nine players are expected to return in 1992-93, including starters Micah Newhouse '93, Marty Beasley '93, and Steve Mozinio '94. They will be asked to continue a tradition of excellence now associated with Taylor basketball. They will be asked once again to make the uncommon become common.—JR
In an ever-changing technological world, we have a very powerful tool available to us in the parenting process: our own lives.

When I was a kid, my dad did all sorts of things that I considered truly amazing. If a cow got outside the fence, Dad would tell me how the animal would behave and how I should get behind it, turn its head, and start it going the other way. Dad could neuter a pig, find a mother chicken and her nest, and tighten the top wire on a fence so it would sound like a violin or a piano. He did a thousand things around the house and farm that made me think he could do anything. In fact, I used to brag all the time about what my dad could do.
I seldom meet young men today who feel this way about their fathers. In fact, most young people have no opportunity to see their parents at work, to see how much they know or what they are able to do. A century ago, sons learned from their fathers and daughters learned from their mothers. But now there are so many new occupations and technologies that parents are often unable to give specific counsel about the world their children are going to face. We would like to be able to mentor our children, to have them follow the path we have chosen, but this is seldom possible today.

So rather than suggest that Christians spend their time reading magazines about country life and trying to re-create the good old days when children worked beside their parents and learned from them, it would be more valuable to look at what we as modern parents can teach our children other than an occupation. “Do as I do” is still a good concept, but there is a way to look at it other than vocationally.

The Bible speaks of love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, and temperance as being the “fruit of the spirit.” These qualities of life that are guaranteed to make us pleasing to God and, at the same time, successful and useful in the world in which we live, regardless of where we live or what we do.

These characteristics assure success and happiness regardless of vocational preference. Parents who can demonstrate these qualities will encourage their children to develop them in the same way parents of previous generations taught specific tasks. And parents who can teach their children these virtues pass on something of much greater value than the knowledge of how to string a fence or outrun a wayward cow.

The question then becomes: “How do we teach these qualities to our children?”

There is no substitute for the kind of side-by-side human contact between parent and child that the earlier, “simpler” life demanded just because most chores required more than one person. In the modern world, where the father gets on a commuter train and goes into the city to work in an impersonal, international corporation, the son finds it difficult to understand what it is that swallows up his father, saps his energy, and sends him home too exhausted to be much fun. That father, rather than spending his Saturday showing his son where he works, should probably choose something that involves more interaction. It could be golfing, fishing, yard work, repairing the house, going to church for a workday, or a lot of different things. The important thing is for the son to see the father in the context of a real world situation and to see how the father reacts in that environment.

A family I know has a cottage at a lake in northern Wisconsin. When they arrived there one spring Saturday, they discovered that their dock had been torn loose by a storm and was all the way across the lake wedged against the shore. The father and son discussed the problem. How were they going to get their dock back?

They decided that towing it with their boat would be dangerous, and perhaps illegal, so they put on their swimming trunks, swam across the very cold, very large lake, and swam back home, pulling the dock behind them.

The father was the first to tell me about this experience, which he described as exhausting, exasperating, and miserable. Later I mentioned it to the son. “Say,” I said, “I heard you and your dad had an interesting experience Saturday with the dock.”

“Yeah,” he said, “we sure did.” Then he began to tell me how heavy the dock was and how difficult it was to pull, and then he began to describe his dad’s tenacity. “I didn’t know Dad could do that. He really hung in there. I was ready to quit, but Dad just kept pulling. I would have given up, but you know my dad, he won’t give up on anything. We stayed at it and stayed at it. That was about the best time Dad and I ever had together. We did everything but cruise at the thing, but we eventually got it across. And we did it all by ourselves. We didn’t have to call anybody to do it or anything. I tell you, I am going to appreciate that dock a whole lot more now that I’ve had to drag it clear across the lake.”

That boy learned something important about his dad and what makes him successful. The truth of the matter is that the boy’s father is a very successful businessman who has provided a beautiful lake cottage for his family. But it hasn’t happened without effort. He is an extremely tenacious person who, over the last fifteen years, has gone through a couple of severe financial crises that might have broken the spirits of other men. But he has stuck with it and has come out on the other side. Now the son understands that the reason his dad is successful is not because favorable things just happen to him; his dad is successful because he keeps on swimming—no matter how cold or hot the water—and will not give up.

This is a tremendous lesson for young people to learn in a world where so many people take shortcuts, believing that success comes through conniving, shaving corners, or manipulating people or rules. This boy may never again have to swim across a lake with a raft in tow, but he will be called on a thousand times in the future to stick with a task and see it to its end.

Another friend of mine was an extremely dependent woman before her husband died several years ago. She relied on him to provide all the good things in life and to make virtually all family decisions. His death left her with three children and a tremendous amount of responsibility. Rather than sit and wring her hands, she decided to go back to school and gain some professional abilities so she could run the family business. Over the course of several years, she earned her degree in and so doing gained the confidence to carry on the business, which she now operates very successfully.

Her daughter, having watched her mother, has become actively involved in the business as well. This mother has provided an example that will be of great benefit to her daughter as she faces the problems, setbacks, and discouragements bound to come her way.

These two stories illustrate that the change in the work world and the advancement of technology does not mean that today’s parents have nothing to offer their children that will contribute to their future success.

The important stuff we pass on is the material from which their futures will be made. And it is closely related to the fruit of the spirit. The fidelity of our love for one another, our family, friends, church, pastor and those around us, will transfer to our kids, who will, by our example, learn to love deeply, be loyal, and exhibit fidelity in everything they do. They will observe and learn from the way we overcome obstacles and difficulties. When I meet young people who believe that everyone is against them and are filled with bitterness, anger, and resentment, I usually find that their parents have the same view of life. Unable to accept personal responsibility for their actions, they have shifted responsibility to others, concluding that their difficulties are the result of someone else's selfish ways.

This martyr complex, characterized by whining, complaining, and blaming others, filters down to their children, causing them the same sort of heartaches that the parents have had.

Where young people actually do become like their parents is in the subtle area of values. They learn something new from us every day and will live their lives according to the models we give them to follow. So the question we must ask ourselves is, "How can I perform in a competent, mature manner so that when my kids copy me, I will be happy with what I observe in them?"

There are two very basic components that maximize the impact we can have on our kids' lives as they imitate our behavior.

First, we must believe in the values we live by. If we are not convinced that our values have worth, no amount of lecturing, arguing, or rule-setting will get the point across. In fact, if we choose this method, our children will learn more about lecturing, arguing, and setting rules than they learn about making moral choices and living godly lives.

Through the study of God's word, commitment to Christ, fellowship with other believers, and responsible living we will gain faith in the biblical building material we are using.

A friend of mine went to school in the early days of the Ford Motor Company's engineering institute and wound up in a high position in the automobile industry. He tells of a little German professor who used to say to the young men, "Have faith in steel."

My friend, though he is nearly eighty years old now, vividly remembers the professor who forcefully pronounced that steel was the most reliable building material for automobiles. You could have faith in a car built of steel, he preached. It would hold up under the tremendous temperature extremes and the great stresses and strains that are put on an automobile over hundreds of thousands of miles.

The steel needed to build children of strong character comes from the principles of God's Word. Family living based on these guidelines will enable us to produce children who will not fall apart after a few miles of wear and tear.

"The one who is in you is greater than the one who is in the world," wrote John in his first epistle (4:1). Many Christians meet seem to doubt this, however. They act as if the Christian faith is some kind of flimsy, poorly constructed vehicle that falls to pieces at every little bump in the road. Not so. The Christian faith is made of solid stuff. It's stronger than any metal turned out in a Pittsburgh steel yard. God made us and has given us instructions which, when followed, guarantee that we will hold up despite the wear and tear on our lives.

Our kids may run into situations where the principles don't seem to work. They will see kids in school who cheat and get ahead. But still we keep living, modeling, and teaching the principle of honesty. I have always said to our kids, "You stick by the principles, you do as God has told us to do, and let God take care of the consequences. Even if a teacher isn't smart enough to understand what has happened and you get a lower grade because the curve has been raised by one or two cheaters, be honest. Honesty is more important than the grade. If that happens, God knows, you know, I know, and the family knows what happened, and we are just as proud of you as if you had gotten an A+ because you got it God's way, the honest way."

It has been a great source of joy for Jamie and me to watch our kids continue some of the convictions we lived by when they were young. For instance, we have always believed and taught that if we tithe our income, God will bless the remaining nine-tenths and make it worth more than ten-tenths when it comes time to pay the bills. Now we hear our children talk about "God's money." The tithe belongs to God, not to them, and although their gross income is relatively small, a percentage of it always goes to the Lord's work—some missionary enterprise, church building project, needy neighbor, or a practical gift of charity. As I look at what they have, I believe God is blessing them because they are living by principles that glorify Him.

Second, we must live by the values we believe in. "Like father, like son" is a phrase all of us have heard. As a college president I get to know many young people, and when I get to meet their parents I am amazed at the likenesses. I often notice that temperament traits required for certain kinds of careers are passed from parent to child. The son of an engineer father who is concerned about scrupulous attention to detail will likely approach tasks in the same manner. The salesman father who is interested in relationships and can create harmony between individuals somehow passes these skills on to his son.

We could get into a debate as to whether these traits are genetic or learned, but I think the argument would be largely academic. The truth of the matter is, we have a very powerful tool available to us in the parenting process, and that tool is our own lives. Therefore, the emphasis of the wise parent is on personal competence, not on perfecting the son's or daughter's behavior.

Our children will learn from watching us, so all the harping and nagging we do about their behavior is less effective than steady, consistent modeling of the behavior we want to see in them.

I reject the idea that modern parents are helpless. Sometimes when we hear about new discoveries in science and math or that there are forty thousand occupations that did not exist when we were going to school, we feel as if we have nothing to offer our young people. We long for the days when life was simpler.

Well, life is not going to get simpler.

The question we must ask ourselves is, "How can I perform in a competent, mature manner so that when my kids copy me, I will be happy with what I observe in them?"

INDEPENDENCE:
Paul & Dody Clark

"My parents have let us make our own decisions," says Doug Clark '95, "and they've let us learn from our experiences."

That is part of the parenting philosophy Paul and Dody Clark of Hartford City, Ind., have used with all five of their children, each of whom attended Taylor.

"They made a lot of their own decisions—right or wrong," says Dody. "They are all very independent."

HOSPITALITY:
John & Maureen Black

Not only did our parents send countless C.A.R.E. packages to each of us and our dorm-mates, but they also opened their home and refrigerator on numerous occasions to the campus Methodist Student Movement, feeding some 30-plus Taylorites on their way to weekend retreats in North Webster, Ind.

"We praise the Lord for their love and support during our Taylor years, and for their continuing witness of faith and love to us and our children."

TAYLOR ROOTS:
Don & Jean Granitz

When Jean (Huffman ’52) Granitz shakes her family tree, a number of Taylor connections appear.

Her father, David Paul Huffman, served on the Taylor Board of Trustees, as did her maternal grandfather, J.C. Bontrager. Her paternal grandfather, Jasper Abraham Huffman, headed the University’s religion department.

Jean attended Taylor herself, as did her husband, Don, her two siblings, and various nieces and nephews.

Jean’s four children graduated from Taylor and each in turn married a Taylor graduate.

GIVING:

A family get-togethers. Our son Tim doesn’t usually organize the activities. At one such gathering, however, shortly before he and his fiancée, Connie, were to be married, Tim asked the entire family to accompany him on a boat ride. That was four grandchildren, and all the adults — and everybody. We thought something must be up.

Tim chided his mother in first. “Mom, we are going to ask the others to be in the wedding, and I don’t want you to feel bad that we’re not asking you. I want you to sit there in the church and be proud of me.”

Once we were out on the boat he addressed the rest of the family. His voice began to quiver as he started out. “Connie and I have talked about it and we want the children in the wedding.” His sisters’ mouths dropped open. Cindy’s twins were only four years old; Deb’s Justin was three and Ali was just a baby. But we were all very pleased.

Then Connie said to Cindy and Deb, “I have learned to love you as sisters and I would like you to stand up with me.” That brought tears to the girls’ eyes because it was very much an honor.

Tim, in turn, asked his brothers-in-law to stand up with him. That, too, was special because he had many friends from college and medical school he could have asked.

George was unaware of what was to happen next. Tim turned to him and said, “Dad, I can’t think of anybody I would rather have as best man at my wedding than you. You are my best friend.”

We all just sat there crying. It was a grand experience. And we still get choked up thinking about it. There’s something about it that just wipes a mom and dad out.

We love our kids and are proud of them, but we are not perfect parents, and would be embarrassed to have anyone think we are. We would alter many things if we could go back and raise our kids again.

One thing we would not change, however, is the emphasis we placed on establishing a strong family unit. Even now, our family enjoys being together. One of the best compliments that we have from our children is that they want to spend vacations with us. That is just fun. Sometimes we ask ourselves, “How many parents would probably yearn for that?”

It’s not the kind of thing that can be programmed, however. For us, it just evolved as one of the by-products of the family unit we had built while the kids were growing up. We had fun together as a family and they want to keep it going.

In Secrets of Strong Families, sociologists Nick &Sten and John DeFray identify six qualities which strong families have in common:

- Good communication patterns

- A high degree of religious orientation

- A high degree of commitment

- The ability to respond positively to crisis and stress

It is significant that spending time together as a family ranks high on that list. For parents, of course, that is easier said than done. But from experience, we’ve put something nice on them and took them up front of the church. But more than the sense of pride we felt was the awesome responsibility we had for raising our children and pointing them toward Christ. We were very humbled by that and committed ourselves to parenting, even as we committed our children to God’s care.
We soon learned, however, that it was a time commitment we were making to our children, as well as a philosophical one. Commitment to kids must be backed up with huge chunks of time. And that isn’t always easy.

One of the parenting choices we made was that Jan would not work outside the home until the children were all in school. And we held to that, though it was very tough going, both financially and emotionally. There were times when Jan thought she’d never work outside the home again, never put her college education to use. Now as we look back, what seemed like an eternity was really no more than a little comma in the sentence of life. We are very glad that she was there for all of them.

Another very conscious decision we made while our children were at home was to sacrifice our social involvement as a married couple. We decided we could not keep up our professions, our family responsibilities, and our adult social life. One of those areas was going to suffer. We opted to let the social life go. Though some people might not have understood, it was one of the wisest decisions we’ve made for our family.

Making time for family is important. As the kids were growing up, we made a commitment to be home every Friday night for “family night.” We would do simple things, like make popcorn or camp out for the night in our Volkswagen van. We also arranged to have “dates” with our children individually. We wanted each one to feel special and to have time alone with us.

During the kids’ growing-up years, George’s cross country and track students became extended family members. Jan took our children to practice sessions, track meets, and training camps. A lot of those things were more impressed on our kids than what we realized at the time.

As educators, we had the summers free and spent them with our children. All three were in Little League, and we can remember very well what it was like every summer, sitting on those benches and getting splinters. It seemed we never ate a decent meal; we would grab a hot dog in the ball park and that was all.

During the rest of the year, our kids were involved in gymnastics, cheerleading, track and field, football, and basketball. One or both of us made it to every game or meet, including away games. It wasn’t easy.

Gymnastic meets must surely try the dedication of any parent. Parents sit there in stone silence—because no one can talk—waiting for those few moments that their child competes on the balance beam or other events.

We can remember away football games: sitting there in the bleachers, freezing, knowing that our child would not participate in every play, but realizing it’s more important he be a part of the team than the star—and equally important he know we’re there for him.

At the time, we thought, “This will never end,” but that stage in our lives is over. In reality, it passed very quickly and now we can easily say it was worth whatever time, energy, and effort we put into raising our children.

It is difficult for any of us as parents to keep the end product in mind. We get so caught up in what is happening at the moment—and what is happening at the moment may be very frustrating. When we have a list of things to accomplish, our children can appear as bothersome interruptions. One child wants to do this, another wants to do that, or we need to do something with them, but the kids are not on our list. However, when we make a commitment to our children, we cannot afford to lose sight of it in the day-to-day frustrations. Though we personally have failed at it many times, parents have to keep thinking that the end result is going to be worth it.

Our kids have families of their own now, and it is fun to see them building on the traditions with which they grew up, and adding new ones. For example, Cindy started an annual kite flying contest last year, a family activity specifically designed to include the grandparents. We’re looking forward to participating in it again a few weeks from now. Deb, too, has started traditions of her own and even teaches a class on the subject for members of her church. It’s gratifying to see an orientation toward family translated into the next generation.

Our son Tim called the other night. Nowadays, that’s an occasion in itself. He and Connie are medical doctors in their second year of residency. Because doctors’ schedules are notoriously busy, we never know when we will get to talk to them. But he called the other night to ask about organizing a family activity. “Dad,” he said, “could we block some time off in January of 1994 and get away for a combined vacation?”

That he and his wife would want to go with his parents somewhere, and that they are planning that far ahead to do it just wipes a mom and dad out. And it speaks to the importance of taking time to build family togetherness.

FOUR TIMES OVER:
Gerald & Bertha Kempf

The words sacrifice and support take on added meaning for parents who have four children in school at the same time. Such was the case for the Kempf family. Mark and Theresa graduated in 1986; Greg and Jerry both graduated in 1987.

DEVOTION:
Robert and Betty Kregel

I admire my parents' solidness in their faith, and their devotion to family. With five children, they have the ability to roll with the punches.

Ronald Kregel '66

AVAILABLE:
Richard & Ruth Lambright

They were always right there when we needed them.

Lori Lambright Wanner '83

SUPPORTIVE:
Joe and Margaret Jones

They were always very supportive of everything I did. It didn't matter if it was sports, academics, or whatever, they always supported me.

When one of our girls was in the seventh grade, we could tell as we spent time together at bedtime that she was uneasy about something. This went on for two or three nights. Finally she shared that she was being pressured to go steady with a boy at school. Then, a night or two later she explained that the boy had given her a ring to wear and she had taken it, but now she wanted to give it back to him.

It would have been so easy just to tell her what to do. But instead of giving her our direct advice about how to handle the situation, we wrestled through it together so that when she made the decision, it would be hers. That kind of communication—open, friendly, honest—is what helped us develop good relationships with our children.

Bedtime was a time when our girls would open up. Small kids are willing to talk then because they will do anything to keep from going to sleep. We took advantage of that. The girls learned that was their special time with their parents alone.

Each girl was put to bed separately. We prayed together and chatted about whatever was on her mind. We assumed it would quit when the girls got into high school, but the tradition continued. They went off to college and when they came home to visit, they still expected us to spend time with them when they went off to bed.

We also found mealtimes to be a good time to talk. In some families, meals are just for eating—"Stop talking and eat your peas." It should be, "Stop eating your peas and talk." The purpose of our meals was not primarily to eat but to enjoy each other—to share our lives. As a family, we tried as much as possible to eat all our meals together.

Sometimes that meant waiting for each other. When our kids got very busy in high school with a lot of extra activities or jobs, we would try to agree on when we were going to eat. Sometimes the house becomes a residential McDonald's for picking up a sandwich and running.

Listening is important in communication. Often kids don't get to explain their side of an issue. Our three girls say it really helped to know they had a voice in what was happening. The decision didn't necessarily go their way, but at least they got to present their side.

As parents, we had to admit that many times our original viewpoint was not always the best. When we would give the girls a chance to explain the issue from their viewpoints, our decision was often changed. Rather than relying only on our partial knowledge or limited perspective, we were able to make better decisions. What our girls thought and felt was important to us.

Teens also need their privacy. They don't have to tell all to their parents. If you have built a good relationship with them, they will want to share what is important and ask you for your help when they need it.

We tried to be ahead of our girls in teaching life development, but sometimes we found that we were behind. We remember getting a note saying our oldest daughter, then in sixth grade, would enter a sex education class in school. We had to hurry up and tell her the night before so she would hear it from us first. We had thought we had plenty of time to bring up the subject.

Parents constantly need to remind themselves that their kids' world is moving faster than they think. One way is to keep in close communication.

Bestselling authors Jim and Sally Conway serve as directors of Mid-Life Dimensions of Fullerton, Calif. Sally's newest book, When a Mate Wants Out, will be released by Zondervan in June. Jim's latest book is Adult Children of Legal or Emotional Divorce, published by InterVarsity Press. They have three daughters: Dr. Barbara (Conway '78) Schneider is a psychologist in Redmond, Wash.; Brenda (Conway '80) Russell is a homemaker in Lansing, Mich., expecting her fourth child; Becki Conway Sanders x '83 is a homemaker with two children in Duncanville, Texas.

HOOISER WISDOM
By Sarah Winters
with Doug Marlow
Though it was their son who gained international prominence, Wendell Willkie's father—a Taylor graduate—and mother were no less remarkable.

n many ways, the partners of the turn-of-the-century legal firm Willkie & Willkie stood apart from other members of their Elwood, Ind., community. For one thing, they were married to each other. In 1897, Henrietta Trisch Willkie became the first woman admitted to the Indiana bar. She joined her husband Herman’s burgeoning legal practice and began putting in full days and many nights handling the overflow business.

Though leaders of the progressive middle class in their community, the Willkies were manifestly their own people and sometimes set tongues wagging. For instance, Henrietta was reportedly the first woman to smoke publicly in Elwood. Selected (and perhaps even more positive) lessons they taught by example to Wendell and their other five children are sketched below.

Prize education.

Herman Willkie dug ditches and worked as a field hand to put himself through his first year of college. He then was able to teach in county schools and so work his way through Taylor University, then known as Fort Wayne College. He graduated with high honors in 1884.

Enjoy reading.

Subsequently appointed superintendent of schools in Milford, Ind., Herman fell in love with one of his grammar school teachers. (They were married by Taylor President William F. Yocum in the college parlor.) The two educators carried into their marriage a love for books.

At a time when most households might boast a dozen or so tomes, theirs was filled with books—some estimates ran as high as seven thousand volumes. The Willkies read widely to their children and encouraged their children to read.

Son Wendell carried the habit into adulthood, reading an average of four books each week. So ingrained was the habit, a friend recalls, that when the candidate found himself with no books available on the campaign trail in Nebraska, he started reading the local telephone directory.

Think independently.

In their professional lives, the Willkies modeled independent thought and action for their children. As the first woman to join the legal profession in Indiana, Henrietta broke with the tradition that a woman’s sphere was limited to children, church, and home. In serving as legal counsel for a striking labor union, Herman bucked the corporate establishment of his conservative town.

At home, the supper table was center stage for an ongoing debate society, the topics ranging from politics to science to philosophy and beyond. Neighbors said the Willkies would rather argue than eat.

Defend the underdog.

In his legal practice, Herman became something of a crusader: he championed unpopular causes and served as defender of the less fortunate, often at the sacrifice of large fees. His children learned from his example. Biographer Ellsworth Barnard would later characterize Wendell as the personification of America’s virtues in fighting against great odds for great causes that crossed national borders.

WENDELL L. WILLKIE, 1892-1944
Internationalist, maverick politician, author

One hundred years after his birth, Wendell Willkie is today remembered as a visionary with an international perspective. A remarkable lawyer, business magnate, and public speaker, he ran unsuccessfully against Franklin Delano Roosevelt as the Republican party’s presidential nominee in 1940. And yet Willkie’s gravestone in Rushville, Ind., pays tribute to a writer. Just below a granite cross sits a huge book carved from stone.

Born Feb. 18, 1892, in Elwood, Ind., Willkie moved to New York City in 1929 to do legal work for Commonwealth and Southern Corporation, a large public utility. Four years later he became its president. In this position, he became keenly aware of FDR’s domestic and economic policies, and subsequently critical of the president’s New Deal program.

A Democrat, Willkie broke with Roosevelt’s party and less than a year later garnered the Republican party’s presidential nomination. That did not set well with many party leaders. Former Indiana Sen-ator James Watson voiced that frustration in an often-quoted story, explaining that although he would not object to the town prostitute joining his church, he would not want her to lead the choir the first night.

Though he lost the election, Willkie gave the Republican party a new leadership style with his dogged idealism and forthrightness.

Roosevelt dispatched him as a special envoy on what turned out to be a 49-day world tour, covering 31,000 miles. Willkie then shared his experiences and his vision for international unity in One World, a runaway bestseller published in April 1943.

Until his untimely death of a heart attack at age 52, Willkie championed the causes of internationalism and civil liberties. Americans, he said, "must lay the moral, intellectual and spiritual foundations for the kind of world we want our children to inherit. That world...must be a world in which America will share with other nations the responsibilities—and the great prospects—of peace.”

Sarah Winters ’92 is a senior mass communication major from South Bend, Indiana. She serves as editor of the student newspaper, The Echo.

Doug Marlow ’81 serves as editor of the award-winning magazine, Taylor. He and his wife, Connie, have three sons, Caleb, Isaac, and Jacob.

Man of vision: Issued Feb. 18, this postage stamp commemorates the Hoosier internationalist.

MOTHER-DAUGHTER TEAM:
Robert & Ann Sheesley

While her husband, Robert, kept the home fires burning, Ann (Bowman '63) Sheesley came back to Taylor in 1962 to complete a degree she had started 20 years earlier.

Ann accompanied her daughter, Roberta, who began her freshman year at Taylor that fall. The two were not only mother and daughter, but fellow classmates, as well.

Says daughter Renita Sheesley Banks '69 of her parents, "They're crazy and wonderful. For 44 years, they've been examples of seeking the truth. They sought truth and did not make me afraid to ask questions."

IN TOUCH:
Donald & Juanita Potts

My parents gave me the opportunity to attend school wherever I wanted, and they supported me financially through school. They came to campus many times. Taylor almost became their second home. I never felt I had gone "out" to school.

FAMILY TRADITION:
Sam '38 and Grace (Dourte x'39) Wolgemuth
Attending Taylor has become a tradition for three generations of the Sam '38 and Grace (Dourte x'39) Wolgemuth family.
Each of their six children graduated from the University (and four married Taylor spouses).
Two of their grandchildren will graduate this year, two others in 1993.

SACRIFICE:

remember how careful Joan and I were when we held our firstborn those first few weeks. When we at last decided that his head was not going to fall off, or that neither of us was so fumble-fingered that we were going to drop him, we began to relax. It wasn’t long before we were holding him rather loosely. After only a few months, I could toss him into the air and catch him confidently, much to his pleasure and mine. Incidentally, recent studies indicate that this insane mania of most fathers is almost necessary in order for the child to develop a good sense of balance.

How firmly, then, must we hold our children? At what stage do we begin to relax our grip and, finally, release them completely to God’s guidance and keeping? When do we begin to prepare them for independence? The granting of independence and the loosening of the parental grip must be commensurate with the maturation of the child; you do not give a seven-year-old a credit card, nor rent a 12-year-old an apartment.

We began to prepare our boys for independence as soon as Joan discovered she was pregnant with each one. From that moment, she prayed almost daily for three things: 1. That they would early in their lives come to know Christ as Lord and Savior (Joan led each of the boys to Christ before they reached the second grade). 2. That they would discover God’s will for their lives as far as their life’s work was concerned. 3. That God would prepare a mate for them, and that they would find that mate in due time (all three of our boys eventually found the answer to that prayer at Taylor, though John was not to marry). The fact that the prayers were made, and that we trusted God to answer them, enabled us to prepare Brian, Joe and John for independence and to hold them with an ever-loosening grip.

We were in essential agreement in the methods and goals of raising our boys. As their parents, Joan and I tried not to be overly permissive nor overly protective. We believed a firm grip was necessary early on in their lives, but with training and trust that grip could gradually be loosened as the boys found their way into a threatening world. Because they were “preacher’s kids,” and thus already had a lot of pressure on them, we determined not to say “no” when we could say “yes.” That enabled them to experience success and failure, wisdom and folly, without devastating results.

Early on, and throughout their days at home, I sought to instill in them a respect for authority. When a parental directive was met with “Why?,” I would always say, “For two reasons: 1. I said so, and 2. Because...and here I would give either the scriptural and/or logical reason.” A child is not ready for independence until he/she has learned to come under authority.

Through practice and precept, we tried hard to communicate our Christian values to the boys from birth to the time they left home. My goal as their father was to make sure that the man the boys saw in the pulpit on Sunday was the same man they shared a home with during the week. To prepare them for marriage, we let them see our own devotion and affection for each other. We spoke highly of the church in the boys’ presence, and I often told them of my own deep satisfaction in serving Christ and his church.

Brian wrote in early grade school that he wanted to be: a) a preacher, b) a doctor, or c) a fireman. Recognizing that his priorities were dictated by: a) what he thought his parents wanted him to be, b) what he thought society wanted him to be, and c) what HE wanted to be...we gave him the freedom to reverse those priorities!

From the first grade on, Joe declared his intentions to be a preacher. When he entered high school, however, we took him aside and told him that we realized that he may have been speaking only from childlike enthusiasm, and that we released him from his declarations. His response at the time was a huge sigh of relief.

When each of the boys approached adolescence and were faced with decisions that could not clearly be resolved by scripture, we encouraged them to pray about it and make their own decision...even if that decision would not have been the one we would have preferred. We also tried to let them hear the consequences of their own bad decisions.

As a result of this open-hearted and open-handed approach to parenting, all three of our boys tried paths that we would have denied them, yet today all three are walking with, and serving God. Shortly after their birth, each of our sons was presented to God in an act of dedication in the church. As their parents, we stood before a congregation and acknowledged our children as having been loaned to us for a while. In reality, at that moment, we loosened our grip, giving God permission to do with our sons what he would.

Had we not done so before, on July 18, 1988, we were forced to open our hands and let our youngest son go. On that day, as a 20-year-old young man having just finished his second year at Taylor, he was suddenly ushered into the presence and glory of God. Our great consolation has been that this was what we had prepared him, and us, for during the first 18 years of his life. It has not been easy, and it was not done in a moment. There are still times when the fingers of our hearts would grasp him, and we must remind ourselves that we gave him to God as a baby, tossing him in the air with ever bolder thrusts toward his freedom to become all that God intended from the beginning.

Preparing children for independence is not a two-week seminar offered during their senior year in high school or college. If we are to prepare them adequately, we must start almost from the time they enter our lives. There will come a time when we must let them go physically. If we have done our job well, we will be able to let them go emotionally as well. For our own good, and for the good of our children, this must be done.

Loosening your Grip

Dr. Reuben Davisson Robinson, a medical doctor turned prominent Methodist clergyman, figures largely in the early history of Fort Wayne College (later Taylor University).

Long time dean of the University, the late Burt W. Ayres remembers him as a large man with a light complexion and blond hair that "stood on end."

An active fund raiser who believed in the mission of the school, Robinson is credited with saving the school from financial ruin more than once by his efforts in soliciting funds, notably from banker Hugh McCulloch. Even after he resigned the presidency, Robinson continued raising funds for the college.

When Robinson entered the ministry, he was ordained by Bishop Beverly Waugh, who had also ordained Bishop William Taylor.

Robinson served as professor of ancient languages at Ft. Wayne College from 1852 to 1854, when he assumed the presidency of the college, serving until 1865. He served again as president 1869-1870, and 1872-1877 for a total of 16 years.

Robinson served the Methodist Church in various capacities throughout his life. As district superintendent in 1882, he was holding a quarterly conference in Hartford City, Ind., when he laid his hands on a teenage boy named Burt Wilmot Ayres and predicted that the lad would later in life have much to do with the continuation of Taylor University.

Robinson died suddenly on August 18, 1889 at age 71.

Blessings upon this faithful Servant of Jesus Christ.—WR

1893

Whether they realized it or not, those 13 faculty members were setting the pace for what was to happen in Upland for the next 100 years...and beyond.

1893

When Taylor University relocated from Fort Wayne to Upland in the summer of 1893, most of her major faculty members moved with the institution, including President Thaddeus Read, Vice President Christian Stemen, Miss Grace Husted and C. L. Clippinger.

The medical school that had been a part of the University, however, cut its ties to Taylor and remained in the city. That Stemen, who had long-term involvement with the medical school, should leave it behind and move to Upland speaks to the kind of devotion he and other faculty members had for the school.

During the first academic year in Upland, the 13-member faculty offered the following courses:

Greek, psychology, church history, homiletics: Dr. Thaddeus Reade, president
Hygiene: Dr. Christian B. Stemen, M.D., vice president
Physics, chemistry, Latin, astronomy: Dr. C. L. Clippinger
German, rhetoric, English literature: Miss Grace Husted
Mathematics: Miss Laurie E. Liddle
Normal school (teacher training): Miss Lizzie Jolly
Commercial courses: Prof. L. D. Peoples
Instrumental music: Miss May Francis
Shorthand, typing: Miss Margaret Stemen
Fine Arts, French: Miss P. Ella Lingo
Physiology: Dr. William E. Stemen
Natural sciences: Prof. S. M. Collett
Voice, theory, harmony, chorus: Prof. Mrs. R. R. Ebright Collett
Dennis, Cobb, Pogue: Speakers of the House

Four years before the first radio program was broadcast in the U.S., and fully a half century before television would become popular, speech instructor W. E. Dennis arrived at Taylor to teach part time while completing a master's degree.

During his six years at the school, the speech program he had instituted in 1901 quickly grew in popularity. It was to remain a favorite among students for some 30 years.

During that time, without the entertainment radio and television would later provide, oratorical and forensic competitions enjoyed nationwide popularity.

Taylor students, under the direction of Miss Florence Cobb, proved a match for their oratorical opponents across the state and nation.

During one four-year period, three of her students captured top honors in the state oratorical contest. One of them, Barton Rees Pogue ’18, later won the Interstate Prohibition Contest and placed third in the 1920 National competition.

Pogue later became famous for his homespun, folksy poetry, and was dubbed the “Hoosier Poet” and acclaimed successor to James Whitcomb Riley.

Early in his literary career, however, Pogue enjoyed an 11-year tenure at the University. During that time he enlarged the quarters of the speech and theater department to encompass the entire third floor of the old administration building, largely at his own expense. In his old age he would reflect, “Coming to Taylor was the only ‘must’ of my life.”

“Speech, when it becomes the servant of the mind, can wield a power more mighty than the pen or sword,” says Harold Pailthorp ’30 in the 1929 Gem.

If that is true, then Taylor graduated some very dangerous characters.

Publication still going and going and going...

Current students and those who have attended Taylor during any of the last 25 years have former roommates Ronald Kregel ’66 and Ronald Oakerson ’66 for keeping them up to date on campus and world events.

During their senior year, the two classmates began publishing the news summary, News of the Day.

Contacted at his home in Lansing, Mich., Kregel describes the publication process: “Every morning we would rise out of bed, listen to the radio, and frantically write down any important news we heard from CBS or WJR-Detroit.”

Kregel and Oakerson then composed detailed news stories for News of the Day, added the weather report, duplicated the day’s issue, and had copies distributed in the dining hall by 11:20 a.m., every Monday through Friday.

That tradition continues on campus in 1992, though the Taylor Student Organization now assumes responsibility for publishing News of the Day, filled with announcements and other items of significance to campus life, and a companion publication, Newsline, a synopsis of current events and off-campus happenings, as well as student editorials on a variety of subjects.

Two roommates started a tradition that yet today forms an indispensable part of every Taylor student’s daily fare.
Perspective

If the wealth of experience is earned a nickel at a time, then the stories of Iris Abbey and George & Eloise Fensternacher offer rich commentary, indeed.

When Miss Iris Abbey, graduate of the class of '15, turns 100 years old this fall, the entire country will mark the day. There will be parades and picnics and speeches; there will be photo opportunities for political candidates, and Labor Day sale-a-thons for the rest of us.

Meanwhile, at a somewhat smaller, though no less spirited celebration, Abbey's family and friends will join together in wishing her many happy returns of the day. Sure to be there are Abbey's sister, Eloise (Abbey '24) Fensternacher, 90, and her husband, George, 92, a graduate of the class of '22. After all, it is not every day a family member is promoted to centenarian.

Careful now, saying that within earshot of Abbey, lest one intimate that old age is to be celebrated for its own sake. She points to a photograph hanging on the wall, one of many family pictures in what she terms her rogues' gallery. "That's my favorite one of George, Eloise and me together," she says, noting it was taken at a banquet given in their honor. "They honored us just because we're old."

Old? If they wanted to, the threesome could lay claim to that distinction. Apparently, there are other matters of greater importance to them. "I don't think about how old I am," says Abbey. "I have so many things to do." And the Fensternachers, obviously still very much in love after 62 years of married life, appear too busy bantering back and forth to be bothered with discussions about their age.

It seems apparent that the perspective from which these three Taylor graduates view life is not accessible to individuals too many years their junior. And no wonder. "I think the time I have lived has been the most interesting time for the nation," says Abbey. "There were so many inventions, so many changes." She remembers the turn of the century ("People made such a fuss about it"), and her first car ride—all of a quarter mile in length ("We never made it to the top of the hill").

According to Abbey, people today make a fuss about different sorts of things—money, for example. Her first teaching position carried a salary of $50 a month, plus room and board. "Money didn't mean so much then as it does now," she says, with a hint of disapproval in her voice for the status quo.

But then, even as a young woman, Abbey evidenced an independent spirit. She pursued an education at a time when women were not especially encouraged to do so. "My mother was so proud of me when I finished high school," she says. "In those days, that wasn't so popular." And Abbey didn't stop there. After graduating from Taylor she received a teaching degree from the University of Michigan in 1924, and took further course work at the University of Chicago and Ball State University.

Abbey was attuned to sexual discrimination at a time when women could be—and some were—arrested for protesting in behalf of women's suffrage. While an instructor of Latin and German at a southern school, she relates, she spent untold hours as a volunteer chaperone for her female students, whereas "the boys could do anything they wanted."

A sense of fair play and moderation was modeled for her by her aunt, Sadie Miller, dean of women at Taylor. Miller didn't always see eye to eye with Dr. Bart Ayres, dean of men. "He was a wonderful man," she recalls, "but he was awfully strict, and my aunt didn't always want to be as strict as he was."

Abbey remembers an incident that occurred in 1912, during the first program of any kind to be presented in the spanking new Helena Memorial Music Hall. It was a piano recital—Abbey's first college recital and she was first on the program. "My mother was more nervous than I was," she says. "In those days I seemed to have more courage and nerve." That day, however, the award for nerve went to the young woman who accompanied Abbey's rendition of Beethoven's 'Moonlight Sonata.' She had a little string of beads in her hair, Abbey recalls. "Oh, Dean Ayres thought that was terrible. He had a hard time with that." She pauses. "But he got over it."

As much as the dean of women helped shape Abbey's perspective on life, even more so did the dean of men fill that role in George Fensternacher's life. The latter remembers Ayres as "one of my best friends" and "the epitome of honesty and straightforward living." In recounting their poignant first meeting, Fensternacher describes a noble Lincolnesque figure caught up in a valiant effort to shoulder much of the administrative weight of a struggling school.

"Dr. Ayres was a power in the school because he was a powerful man," says Fensternacher. "Watching him, I learned that if you want to have clout, you have to be a big enough person to carry clout."

As a student at Taylor, and then as a faculty member for a quarter century, including nine years as dean of men, Fensternacher would learn many such lessons. They would help to shape his perspective on life.

When I went to Taylor, it was a very staid, rigid, second-blessing school," he says, referring to the emphasis on John Wesley's entire sanctification or Holiness theology that prevailed at Taylor during the first half of this century.

"Taylor has had a steadying influence in my life," Fensternacher says, "not in its (Holiness) theology, but in giving me a warm Christian love for God and everyone I might meet."

His wife, Eloise, echoes that sentiment. "Taylor had a lot of influence on me," she says. "I went to the Academy (a high school Taylor operated as there were no public high schools available), graduated from the college, and took graduate work there." The itinerary Eloise recounted had not been the original plan, however.

When sisters Eloise and Iris Abbey arrived in Upland in 1910, they came for what was to be a two-year stay. Previously, an aunt of theirs had come to Taylor to work in the college dining hall; when their mother, Alberta, and Aunt Sadie had visited their sister in Upland, Sadie was impressed with Taylor's school of music and decided to stay—Alberta decided she and the four children would come for two years.

"Dad (Merrit Abbey) stayed at home," says Abbey, "but when he came out to visit, Taylor was just ready to build the music hall. They coaxed him to stay. He was superintendent of buildings and grounds for 30 years."

Like the Abbeyes, Fenstermacher arrived at Taylor thinking he would stay but a short while. And like the Abbeyes, his plans changed.

"He roomed in my mother and father's house," recounts Eloise, "My parents took in students; his room was right over our parlor. He'd play the violin and I'd be sitting there, enjoying what I could hear."

"She'd knock on the pipe when I finished playing," Fenstermacher says with a grin, "That meant, 'Play again.'"

Perhaps it meant more, Eloise confides, "I fell in love with him while he was playing the violin." The couple's devotion to each other was not lost on their contemporaries. Printed after Eloise's name in the 1924 senior class prophecy is the prediction, "Spent 20 years of married life at T.U. as the wife of the noted violin professor." Fenstermacher actually spent a total of 25 years at Taylor.

Besides endearing himself to his future wife, Fenstermacher's skill on the violin, coupled with his knowledge of the German language, landed him a job at the college. "I kind of backed into teaching at Taylor," Fenstermacher says. He taught violin, orchestra, and German while a Taylor student, and was asked to join the faculty following graduation.

Similarly, Abbey backed into her high school teaching career—or, as she says, "I was pushed...I never expected to teach school." She explains that President Vayhinger's wife learned of an opening for a Latin and German teacher and submitted her name. "I said, 'I can't do that, I haven't looked at a Latin book in five years.' She said, 'Yes, you can.' So I agreed to it. It was the start of a career from which she would not retire until age 72.

Until just recently, Abbey and the Fenstermachers lived near the campus. Earlier this year, however, Abbey moved to Fort Wayne, Ind., where she resides with her nephew and niece, Edwin '80 and Marlene Fenstermacher. George and Eloise Fenstermacher now reside in the United Methodist Memorial Home, Warren, Ind.

Despite their physical absence from the Upland community, the three carry an abiding sense of care and concern for Taylor University and unique perspectives on the school, rooted in having seen it grow, develop, and change over the years. Fenstermacher readily articulates his perspective:

"Taylor is facing a spiritual test," Fenstermacher says. To illustrate his point, he relates an incident involving student C. David Clench '27. Learning that a less-than-pious fellow student could not afford to continue his education at the University, Clench approached the administration with a proposal that would allow his classmate to remain at Taylor. If his plan were approved, Clench would surrender his dormitory room to the unwitting student, and he himself move into an empty grain storage room in the old dairy barn then located on campus. Besides a cot, straw bales to block the wind coming through the barn slats, and permission to use, as a desk, the box formerly employed to store farm records, Clench asked only that his fellow student not be informed of what was happening. "That was not only proposed, that happened," Fenstermacher emphasizes.

He contrasts that incident with one of more recent vintage. Not too long ago, Fenstermacher says, he was approached by a parent who insisted she be allowed to rent his garage, located close to campus.

"It's already rented," he replied.

"I'll pay you double what you're getting now," came the reply, then this explanation: "We had to get our son a car. We bought him a convertible in order to get him to come to Taylor. I want your garage because that convertible has to be inside for the winter."

"It's not for rent."

"I told you I'd pay you double."

"It's not that; I've already promised it to someone else."

"Well. You don't own this empty lot. Do you?"

"Yes. I do."

"Why don't you build garages all down that grass? You could make a lot of money."

"The answer is simple. We like grass better than we do garages."

Fenstermacher iterates. "Taylor is facing a test—a spiritual test. It's going to be very difficult. I can't tell you how to do it...You've got the work resting in your hands that is on the wrong track, but you also have the opportunity to wrest it back to the right track...

And in Fenstermacher's opinion, that would be something to celebrate.—DM

Taylor gatherings in this country and internationally unite alumni, friends, current and prospective students and their parents — friends, all, who share a common interest and belief in the mission of Taylor University.

Taylor Plan dinners offer involvement opportunities

By the end of May, nearly two years since the inception of the Taylor Plan, one half of Taylor University alumni and friends will have had the opportunity to attend a Taylor Plan dinner. "The Taylor Plan dinner strategy is an attempt on Taylor's part to take the mission of the University to alumni and friends through a banquet setting," says Ron Sutherland, director of the Taylor Fund. "We're thrilled. Those who choose to come are sensing Taylor's needs, and are responding when they understand those needs."

Upcoming Taylor Plan dinners:
May 14: Allentown, Pennsylvania
May 15: Cherry Hill, New Jersey
May 16: Philadelphia, Pennsylvania
Late May: Warren, Pennsylvania
Erie, Pennsylvania
Buffalo, New York

National Alumni Council

The Taylor University National Alumni Council, led by president Dick Gygi '67, held its mid-winter meeting on campus January 10-11. The council focused on two primary agenda items: enhancement of multicultural awareness on campus and increasing the level of alumni participation in giving.

In addressing multicultural awareness, NAC member Scott Preissler '83 led a seminar/discussion to which the president, provost, executive cabinet, and key administrators were invited to preview a videotaped presentation. Discussion and interaction followed.

President-elect Don Granitz '52 led the group's analysis of ways to involve alumni in increasing the endowment and giving. He presented the NAC's five-year goal of raising alumni participation from 36 percent to 50 percent, which calls for an annual increase of approximately three percent. The NAC spent most of Saturday calling alumni, and asking for their help as volunteers in increasing alumni participation.

The NAC is a working council, committed to making a difference on behalf of the Taylor student body, faculty and administration.—CS health care directive, no self-determination statement, no living will. Yet, the state deems the proxy competent whether or not she cares about the fetus.

One might say the fetus has no rationale, no inclinations, no verbal power. This is exactly the point and speaks to the need of the competent proxy, one who will make decisions in the best interest of the child.

Proxy authority implies by definition a moral stewardship to the principal, or the one unable to make decisions for herself. So no matter what the reason for the mother's decision to abort, whether circumstantial, financial, medical, or ethical, she presumes upon the will of the child when she aborts; she becomes a proxy failure.

Fetal property

Competent decision making in behalf of another is paramount in health care proxy everywhere—why not with respect to the mother and her unborn? Perhaps it is because we do not care about the unborn, or worse, we believe a pre-born fetus is property, at least for the early months. We further presume fetuses have no will of their own, so who cares if the mother is competent. The issue is moot.

To say that a fetus has no will to live is almost ludicrous. Even if the pre-born faces inevitable death or lifelong misery, she still grows each day and fights for survival. She is not on artificial life support or artificial hydration, nutrition, or respiration, unless of course you reckon the mother a machine. Even then, should the machine possess the right to pull its own plug, let us say, to prolong its shelf-life, or respiration another life another day?

If a mother refuses to bring a child full term, perhaps she has failed her proxy responsibility and should be judged incompetent until she changes her mind. If we permit her the right to abort, her proxy stewardship is deemed a blank ticket for self-seeking decision making without regard for the infant.

This is the crux. By permitting abortion, the government gives the proxy the right to terminate life without consent. However, the state retains true proxy authority mid-term. It thus yields power and responsibility early, retains them in the middle of the pregnancy, and ends up willfully fixing an arbitrary competency based on the age of the fetus. This is tragic.

Who then should become the pre-born's proxy if shared rights between mother and state still permit abortion? If government continues to uphold Roe v. Wade, the true proxy voice of the pre-born will be the pro-life movement.

Emerging battles over speech rights

The primary issues are ones of speech rights and proxy authority—the state's, the mother's, the baby's, and yours. The struggle wages over who will speak for a pre-born infant who cannot speak for herself and what will be the legal boundaries of that voice. Legislation, case law, parental prerogative, and prophetic call all intertwine on the matrix of the contemporary abortion dialog.

Suppression of the church's prophetic proxy voice will only stand to accentuate both the need and reality of vocal Christian values. As long as abortion is legal, someone must stand up and speak for the child who faces death, even if it means imprisonment.

For the time being, one may be arrested for speaking to a woman within fifteen feet of an abortion clinic if such counseling is not done properly. One may even be arrested for encouraging people to rescue. Sadly, it appears that it will not be long before one is even arrested simply for speaking too loudly.

The impending doom

As we move beyond 25 million American abortions since 1973 and 50 million global abortions per year, one must wonder what kind of stench the dismembered corpses make in the nostrils of the Almighty God. Divine judgment is likely inevitable, and our fate can scarcely be better than Manasseh who was wiped clean "as one wipes a dish" because of his shedding of innocent blood, or of Ahaz who burned his children in the fire to the "ruin of him and of all Israel" (II Kings 21:12-18 and II Chron. 28:23). What does God think when the fetal head that he "covered in the mother's womb" is crushed with forceps and vacuumed out of the uterus (Ps. 139:13)?

If legal rulings insist on defining first amendment rights to not include strong pro-life vocalizations, the blood of Abel will continue to cry from the proverbial ground with an eric interrogative brush-off, "Am I my baby's keeper?" Moreover, the government will continue to legislate suppression of pro-life articulation, completely ignorant of the fact that God's voice will be heard above all the legal harangue. So why do we speak at all? Not only because scriptures mandate it, but because there's a baby who, if she could talk, would surely appoint a pro-fetus, pro-life, pro-baby proxy.—DS

*Pro-choice Network of Western New York v. Project Rescue Western New York Preliminary Injunction Cm 90-18044 (0) Feb 14 1992

TAYLOR • SPRING 1992
Target: Buffalo, New York
Date: April, 1992
Activity: Pro-life rescue

Battle for the proxy voice of the pre-born

In the Book of Isaiah and Jeremiah did not shirk their responsibility to condemn infant sacrifice of first born children to Moloch, a Canaanite astral deity, so why should any Christian refrain from castigating a modern day Tophet like abortion? They might get arrested, that’s why.

To those facing the epiphany of the rescue movement the week after Easter in Buffalo, New York, nothing is clearer than the imminence of arrest. Arrest has never stopped rescues in the past and will certainly not this time, but new illegalities simply add fuel to the already raging fire. The kindling amounts to new muzzles, bits, bridles, and spurious vocal restraints already fitted for the mouths of the April protesters.

While criminal trespass is still among the forbidden moves of rescuers (people who break human law in order to discourage women from their abortion), there are now new gag restraining orders that make speaking, certain kinds of speaking, against the law. The government is dictating to people what they cannot say and where they cannot say it.

Presently, on site, pro-life overtures to women seeking abortion is criminal unless it is carried out according to specified legal procedures. In addition, aiding and abetting any of a number of new criminal activities is also illegal, particularly speaking in behalf of the April activities. 1 What results is a gag order that spills over into the pulpit. As a pastor, I find my blood boils at this.

The Attorney General of the State of New York, Robert Abrams, further claims in a preliminary statement registered in a U.S. District Court on March 3rd that under the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871, U. S. C. 1985, people “motivated by an invidious, class based animus” are forbidden to mount a conspiracy to deny women the right to an abortion. 2 In other words, if I preach from the pulpit that we should support the pro-life movement in Buffalo, I am part of an unlawful conspiracy. When I wittingly foster rescue activities, even legal ones, I may be criminally liable.

Suppression of prophetic voices

The obvious effectiveness of the prophetic voice of the pro-life movement is drawing decisive legal response. But as long as the state tries to stifle that voice, the words cannot help but get louder and become the focal point of future legal watersheds.

Unfortunately, however, silence reigns as status quo in my own branch of fundamentalism, and prophetic suppression emerges from within the covenant community. But this is nothing new.

Those who know the scriptures best usually say the least and refuse to take up the cause of the unborn child. Most of my colleagues refuse to assist in pro-life protests because of the elaborate separatist rituals that forbid fellowship with the doctrinal deviance of anti-abortion bedfellows. They become one of the strangest suppressors of a pro-life prophetic voice; new gag restraints will not help.

Since Rescue proper is illegal, its cognates—protests, marches, picketing, education, and sermons—are avoided. Meanwhile, over 130,000 abortions are completed every day worldwide. This amounts to one every .75 second, or 150 since you began reading this article.

A conservative view of civil disobedience is not, however, reason enough to dissociate oneself from pro-life activities. There are other legal activities that make valuable contributions to a corporate voice. Those who avoid affiliation with the pro-life movement because of association with the civilly disobedient become as passive and silent as the aborted fetus. They forfeit their responsibility as proxy voice and become a genocidal accomplice.

Proxy voice for the pre-born

Who is the voice of the pre-born? The mother, naturally. Or is she? Since she does only what the state permits her to do, both the mother and the state control the destiny of the baby.

In reality, the state yields proxy power, decision making authority, to the mother in early pregnancy. The mother then becomes her baby’s voice. However, is an adult competent to function as the decision-maker, the proxy, for the child? Is it a pregnant mother carrying out the wishes of her child when she decides to abort the fetus? It is a decided conflict of interest to permit a mother to make decisions about abortion.

In our state, the mother is appointed proxy at conception by default. The baby signed no advance health care directive. no self-
Endow the vision.

Without going broke.

Like Coach Glass, you, too, can make a significant contribution to the University and help ensure that Taylor will continue to fulfill her historic mission.

Thanks to an innovative program developed by Taylor’s own National Alumni Council, donors with even relatively limited financial resources can make long-term endowment gifts of $25,000, $50,000, $100,000, and more.

Under the “Endowing the Vision” program, your modest tax-deductible gift, pledged over a one-to-five-year period, is used to purchase a life insurance policy or invested, and allowed to mature.

The result is a significant gift that will build Taylor’s endowment fund and benefit students far into the future.

You can have the satisfaction of establishing a major endowment fund now.

You can help fulfill the mission of Taylor University.

And you can still keep your basic means of transportation.

Call or write today for an informative brochure.

An alumni participation program

I’ve been a teacher all my life.

I thought, “Even if I sell everything I have, including my old van, there’s no way a guy like me can make a $25,000 gift to Taylor University.”

But I did.

And I kept my van, too.
