Dog City After Dark After reading The Great Divorce

Rick Hill
Dog City After Dark After reading The Great Divorce

Cover Page Footnote

This essay is available in Inklings Forever: Published Colloquium Proceedings 1997-2016: https://pillars.taylor.edu/inklings_forever/vol10/iss1/100
DOG CITY AFTER DARK
After reading The Great Divorce
by Rick Hill

Everybody has a dog in my neighborhood, and all the dogs are pacing sad ruts around their junk-lumber doghouses.

And after dark the dogs bark warnings, inquiries—bark insults and defiance till morning, bark short-chain, short-chain, all night long.

Listen, dogs, I understand you can’t articulate your more complicated longings,
and I realize you’re sick of those piles that ring
the end of your lonesome tether.

But we all have to live in this little gray town Let’s try to wag with it, dogs. Let’s curb our incessant yipping, heel our pathetic whine

when the master draws near but then is seemingly yanked back to his easy chair in the big house.
And let’s face it, dogs:

whatever we’re trying to get across, all the rest hear is barking, snarling, irritating, chain rattling, growl bark growl
just dog noise.

So snuffle down now, dogs. Watch the moon sink and the stars dim. The world is pausing, steeling itself for morning.

We’ll all have our day, brothers, but no one is going to unhook anyone—not this long tonight,
oh love, not just yet.

(Revised for the conference. Original version published in Christianity and Literature, Winter 2000. Also anthologized in Christianity and Literature’s Best of Fifty Years issue.
2001 and Imago Dei: Poems from Christianity and Literature, Abilene Christian University Press 2012)